

American Constitution

My freedom matters to me and the Constitution makes sure of that. The Constitution lets me do what I want in some cases. It preserves my freedom by the 1st Amendment and the 9th amendment.

I have the freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, and freedom of petition. I have the freedom of speech. I have the right to protest things to the government. About things I don't see fit that the government is doing. It is important to me because I can say what I think is better than what is happening.

I also have the freedom of press. I have the right to write or publish things without punishment from the government. My writing also can't be controlled by the government. To shape it in their favor, I have control of my own work. I can also write magazines, which are similar to newspapers that the government can't bend into their favor.

I also have the freedom of religion. I have the right to practice a religion. The government also can't punish me for practicing a religion. Even if the government doesn't like what someone is practicing they can't force you to change it. The government can't tell me what religion to practice, I can choose any religion I desire.

I have the freedom of assembly too. I can gather a lot of people in one area. Without the government interfering and separating people from each other. They don't have to fear the government pulling them apart. We all can gather peacefully.

I have the freedom of petition as well. People can gather signatures of voters to propose a problem to the government.

That they think doesn't fit for them. The people are also protected from the government trying to punish them for making a petition.
